Bill B Day 1919 - 2013

Bill B. Day was an all American that grew up during the great depression, served his country during the war (pictured above) and lived in New Mexico and the Texas Panhandle on Route 66. You wouldn't think a person like Bill B. Day had any affiliation with UFOs if you met him but he had some profound UFO encounters.

Bill was not into science fiction or telling tall tales, more of a John Wayne type of guy, but he would tell stories about his days growing up on a farm. On one such occasion while milking cows in the barn early in the morning hours he thought the world was coming to an end when a fireball lit up the sky like daylight. It was a giant fireball streaking across the sky. The fireball left a huge trail in the sky. The trail the fireball made remained in the sky for some time.

While in the army air force (pre-USAF) in New Mexico, before the alleged Roswell UFO crash, he tells the story of lying in the grass with his father and seeing a triangular formation of UFOs go from horizon to horizon and come back the other way again flying at a high rate of speed. A story that is similar in ways to the Lubbock Lights that would happen years later. Bill Day also attended Texas Tech University where the Lubbock Lights incident took place. During the war Bill Day would tune in to the famous radio broadcast The War of the Worlds by Orson Wells and run to the mess hall to warn others of an invasion only to learn it was a spoof. Bill Day would go on to become a radio disc jockey.
